Bomb scare reaction... Dormies: It was no big deal

By Patty Hayes
Staff Writer

Some Yosemite Hall residents were inconvenienced by Wednesday evening's bomb scare in the R-2 parking lot, but most said they were not afraid.

"I bet somebody 10 bucks it was a fake," Peter Loeb, a Yosemite Hall resident adviser, said of the incident.

"It didn't seem very professional and organized," Loeb said in reference to how the situation was handled by safety officials.

The device, discovered about 5:15 p.m., was a fake, but Cal Poly Public Safety, San Luis Obispo city police and the SLO County bomb squad all reported to the scene. It was removed and detonated by the bomb squad Wednesday evening, only to find that it was a pipe stuffed with toilet paper.

Several dorm residents watched as the parking lot was roped off and the "bomb" was removed in a large box.

Jennifer Franks, an interior design freshman, said Thursday, "We saw they had roped off the area and some friends from upstairs came running saying that it was a pipe bomb."

"It didn't seem that exciting," dents said was inconvenient.

"I needed to leave and I couldn't get to my car," one resident said.

One student was arrested when he passed the police line and entered the lot. James Patrick Preciado, a 23-year-old electrical engineering junior, was charged with interfering with the duties of a fire official and with battery. He was booked into County Jail and was released on $5,000 bail at 1:20 a.m. Thursday.

Preciado said Thursday afternoon that he had nothing to do with the bomb scare. He maintained that he was going to his car about 7:30 p.m. after studying with a friend who lived in the dorms.

"I didn't see anything going on in the parking lot," he said. "It wasn't roped off — not where my car was at."

He said he was aware of a

There weren't more than 15 people (watching) at one time. If this were in L.A., there would have been TV cameras and a lot more fire trucks.

Cal Poly student sets sights on position of SLO County clerk

Political science senior hopes to get citizens involved

By Cyndi Smith
Staff Writer

A Cal Poly student is running for county clerk this June and hopes his fresh attitude and idealistic approach will help get him elected.

Paul Balbas, a 25-year-old political science senior from San Jose, believes the San Luis Obispo county government does not involve the people enough and thinks he can change that if elected to the four-year position.

"I was raised to believe that the government works for the people, not for themselves and their own benefits," he said. "There is definitely a 'good ole boy' network here in San Luis, and I think they've lost sight of who they're working for — the people."

The county clerk is in charge of registering voters, filing court papers, acting as county recorder and overseeing special district elections, such as school and water board. Mitch Cooney, the current county clerk, has held the position for 16 years.

"Cooney has not worked hard enough recruiting voters," said Balbas. "I was also very disillusioned with him when he refused to take a stand on the Paul Floyd issue. He should support Floyd if he thinks he is innocent, and speak out against him if he thinks he is guilty."

Floyd, the county auditor/controller, is in the middle of civil hearings for alleged sexual harassment and drinking on the job.

Balbas has worked during the past year for attorney Stewart Jenkins as a paralegal and

EOC director says county homeless are local families, children — not transients

By Kathy Kenney
Staff Writer

Relief for the homeless in San Luis Obispo County has become increasingly focused on whole families, said a community activist Thursday.

Biz Steinberg, the executive director of the San Luis Obispo County Economic Opportunity Commission, said those people who lack basic necessities for survival are not just transients passing through from San Francisco to Los Angeles.

Many of them are county residents who need food, clothing and shelter, she said.

"We take those things for granted," the part-time Cuesta Community College and Allan Hancock College instructor said.

Claiming that everyone has a responsibility to the homeless, Steinberg asked the more than 50 students, community members and professors who were gathered in Room 220 of the University Union if they could recall when they had to think about where they would get such basic needs as a warm meal, blankets and a shower.

Soviet McDonald's just a start

By Stewart McKenzie

Two days ago, an icon of American capitalism sashayed into the Soviet Union. Finally, a Russian citizen could taste the quintessential American meal in the form of a koktel, kartofel-fries and a Beeg Mak Gamburger.

It's McDonald's of Moscow — the McHammer-and-McSickle version.

After 14 years of dealing with bureaucracy, a Canadian franchise of McDonald's succeeded in opening what will be the first of several restaurants in the Soviet Union. $50 million was plunked down for this venture, including an entire production facility to make the food.

The first day was tough, according to an article in the Los Angeles Times. More than 30,000 people passed through the Golden Arches, sometimes waiting more than an hour to plunk down 3.75 rubles ($5) for just the Beeg Mak alone. You wonder what the price of Steak 'n Seafood would be if Sizzler opened its doors in Moscow.

But, it seemed most were happy with McDonald's. People said the wait was relatively short, compared to what they were used to. The employees smiled and said, "Thank you." The restaurant was clean and spotless. The Russians haven't learned yet that the thrown pickles stick to windows, but they'll find that out soon enough.

It was a triumph for America. Finally, after sending over earlier successful ambassadors — including Pepsi, Billy Joel and Bon Jovi — we've succeeded in exporting suburbia to the U.S.S.R. Thousand Oaks, meet Moscow. All the other good things of the suburbs, like split-level ranch-style homesteads, cul-de-sacs and Pak 'n Save are sure to follow.

In this new era of glasnost, the list of American exports is endless. Among the ideas:

- We can finally get rid of all those Garfield stick-em-ups, Cabbage Patch Dolls and Rubik's Cubes; Herbalife; Milli Vanilli; Teen Beat magazine and Dan Quayle.

- N.W.A. and Public Enemy could do a benefit concert in Moscow — the innocent and carefree world of rap/hip-hop — with carefree songs like "Fight The Power" or "Gangsta Gangsta."

- Illicit drugs could be exported just by sending Nancy Reagan's "Just Say No" bandwagon abroad. This would give encouragement for the Russians to find out what they're saying, "No" to.

- Products, products, products! Tide with Bleach. Personics. Soap on a Rope. Cellular fax machines. VCRs with auto-reverse Dolbyized Quadrophonic Hi-Fi Surround-Sound. Midas muffler shops. El Pollo Loco. Tacos Acapulco.

Most of all, I pledge that a May Co. department store should be built somewhere in the Soviet Union — only if they're still selling pieces of the Berlin Wall for $10 a pop.

Second Opinion

Family-planning decision 'wise'

Gov. George Deukmejian is to be congratulated for putting aside his pride and personal irritation in settling the dispute over crucial family-planning funds. The governor did not sign the bill passed by the legislature to restore $20 million to family planning programs, but he didn't veto it, either. That means state funding is again available for birth-control counseling, pregnancy testing and cancer, AIDS and venereal-disease screenings for half a million poor and uninsured women.

The family-planning fight had degenerated into a sometimes ugly battle between anti-abortion and pro-choice advocates and between alternately nervous and self-righteous politicians. But the governor managed to rise above it.

In his message to the legislature, he wrote: "I am willing to yield to the majority of the legislature on this bill to relieve them of a potentially prolonged and difficult process and to continue to maintain the spirit of cooperation between the legislature and the governor ..."

The family-planning fight has also been a prolonged educational process for many. Pro-choice advocates underestimated the discomfort the governor and some conservative legislators felt about some family-planning agencies and the possibility the state was paying for "abortion counseling."

By the same token, some anti-abortion advocates did not seem to understand that family-planning counseling, by law, must inform a woman of all her options, but that state-funded family-planning clinics never were in the business of abortion.

In the end it may not have been the sensible arguments for family-planning services that settled this controversy but the political realities. After the bills to restore family-planning funding received overwhelming support in both houses, it was not clear that a gubernatorial veto could be sustained.

Many Republicans were nervously eyeing pro-choice public opinion polls and taking phone calls from supporters who saw the politically ill-advised stand against family planning as an anathema to those who want alternatives to abortion.

U.S. Sen. Pete Wilson, a moderate Republican who hopes to succeed Deukmejian as governor next year, was also not shy about applying political pressure.

Still, in the end, the call was the governor's and he could have stubbornly put his shoulder to the door and tried to keep it shut against the oncoming crowd. Instead, when he saw the crowd coming, he opened the door. And that was the wise thing to do.

BA&E building needs bike racks

Editor — By now, bicyclists have become accustomed to parking their bikes on the outer perimeter and walking to class, subjecting themselves to the same humbling routine as those who drive cars must do. Although I don't agree with it, I can at least understand there are valid reasons for restricting bicyclists from the inner perimeter.

What I find intolerable is the mindless method of implementation of the new parking restrictions. If all the bike racks must be removed from the inner perimeter, it would seem logical to move them to a new terminus to encourage compliance.

Instead, they were simply dug up and stacked in the maintenance yard next to the confiscated bicycles. I counted 21 racks stacked back there. It doesn't take much math to realize they would perform a more valuable service elsewhere.

A logical location, one might suspect, would be in front of the Business Administration and Education Building, since that is as far as the new rules allow us to go on California Boulevard. Empirically, one need only count all the bikes parked there illegally, locked to stairs and handrails, to confirm this suspicion.

Poly's ceremony 'offends' graduate

Editor — When I went through Cal Poly's fall commencement in December 1989, religion "touched" me.

Was the ceremony for the graduates? The family and friends of those graduates? Or for those graduates, their families and friends who believe in Christianity?

In my opinion it was for the latter.

Directly after President Warren Baker's remarks and before the graduates' names were to be called, the special music included "Glory to God in the Highest" sung by the University Singers. I was amazed and offended.

Whatever happened to the separation of church and state? Perhaps those who decided this song should be in the ceremony might try to pass it off as Christmas tradition. This still brings up the same problem — inflicting the religion of one group on everyone else.

Graduation is a time of joyous celebration for everyone, and I hope this will be reflected in future Cal Poly graduation ceremonies.

Delta Chi should remove posters

Editor — I am disgusted by the Delta Chi spring rush poster in which a man is sitting on a desert island with a bikini-clad woman in each arm.

The blatant objectification of women in this poster victimizes all females.

Why is it that only the women are holding the beer? Is it that they are there to serve the man? Or is it easier to take advantage of women when they are drunk?

I am requesting Delta Chi to remove these posters and replace them with something more socially responsible. Until then, whenever I see one of these posters I will remove it and urge others to do the same.

Program gives opportunity to take courses at Paris university

By Cyndi Smith
Staff Writer

Paris in the springtime may be celebrated in song, but Cal Poly students liked it just fine in the fall.

The Paris study program began here fall quarter, giving students the opportunity to take Cal Poly equivalent courses taught by Cal Poly professors at a university in Paris.

The program, sponsored by the American Institute for Foreign Study — the same group that sponsors the London study program — will be available to students every fall quarter. Although the Paris study program is like London study in many ways, it is also distinctly unique, said Odile Clause, one of the professors accompanying students to Paris last fall.

"Of course, one of the main differences between the programs is the language," said Clause. "We get more of an international atmosphere by speaking the language."

Paris study also has a language requirement — two years of French at the high school level, or one year at the university level.

Another difference between the programs is that while London students stay in apartments, Paris students stay in homes with French families.

"This aspect of the program forces the students to mix with the French," said Clause. "There is always that tendency to stay with your own little American group, but this way you really can't."

A third difference is that Paris is centrally located in Europe. This gives students a better opportunity to travel on weekends, said Clause.

This year, 14 students and two faculty members, Clause and Don Lazere from the English department, participated in the program. Clause hopes to have as many as 30 next fall.

"We have room for 60 and if we get that many it would be great," she said. "It is an experience no one will forget."

Students that participated in the program agreed. "It was definitely the best quarter of my

Student ag program sows successful seeds

Students in the School of Agriculture can reap profits while sowing the seeds of future careers.

Through the Agricultural Enterprise Projects program, students can prepare land to be seeded, irrigate and fertilize the land, market and sell the product — and earn a profit.

"It's an opportunity for students to apply what they learned in the classroom to real-life situations," said Charles Crabb, associate dean of the School of Agriculture.

According to a student agricultural enterprise agreement, Cal Poly Foundation will furnish students all the necessary equipment, tools and facilities to complete an enterprise project.

Crabb said if there's a profit after figuring net income, in most cases two-thirds of the profit go to the students and the remaining one-third to the School of Agriculture Net Reserve. The Foundation holds and manages the reserve fund.

"The reserve is built to help capital expenditures on projects and to cover any losses," Crabb said.

But most projects put money into the reserve, Crabb said, as opposed to suffering a loss.

"For the most part, the projects make money, he said. "If there is a loss, the School of Agriculture Net Reserve absorbs the loss."

Crabb said most of the work done on enterprise projects is by students with supervision and advice from a faculty member.

"The willingness of faculty to put in time to work with students on a one-to-one basis make the projects successful," Crabb said.

Anyone within any major or school at Cal Poly can sign up through CAPTURE to be on a project. Other than having interest in a project, there's no requirement, he said.

"The majority of the students are within the School of Agriculture within their particular disciplines," Crabb said. Crop science students, for example, would do a crops project.

Crabb said student response to the projects has been positive.

"The average response from students is, 'It's one of the best things I've done at Cal Poly,'" he said. "Most students walk away with a sense of accomplishment."

Crop Science Professor Gene Offerman said the student enterprise project fits the Cal Poly motto of learn by doing.

"The benefit for students is learning the techniques involved in producing crops and also putting into practice what is learned in the classroom," he said.

Crabb said no other U.S. university compares to Cal Poly in its unique hands-on experience of enterprise projects.

"They (other universities) don't have as many students in projects and they don't have the diversity in projects," he said.

He said enterprise projects give students a definite advantage when talking with prospective employers.

"Employers prefer to hire students with project experience," Crabb said.

According to the Cal Poly Foundation's 1988-89 Annual Report, agricultural enterprise projects with student involvement included dairy husbandry and products manufacturing, production and processing of beef, swine, sheep and poultry products, production of small grains, vegetables and fruits, and processing of food products such as jelly and salsa. Other projects include the two working ranches — the Swanton Pacific and the Basham ranches.

"I wouldn't want to be a lawyer, though," he said. "I am just interested in knowing the laws better if I go into politics."

This is his first campaign for public office. Balbas has lived in San Luis Obispo for five years and plans to settle here.

Balbas said he feels that he can do a better job recruiting voters through speeches at the high school and college level.

"I know I'm qualified for this position, and I really want to get people involved," he said. "It's gotten so bad that people are afraid to even go pay a traffic ticket because the county employees are unwilling to help them. I hope to change that."

"I guess I have an idealistic point of view," he said. "I believe if you want to make things better you can do it with hard work. And I am ready to put in that hard work."

Cultural center observes birthday

Visitors listen to ethnic music, eat foreign delicacies

By Monica Ortiz
Staff Writer

Visitors sampled Greek pastries and South African sauces while ethnic music played Thursday at Cal Poly's Multi-Cultural Center's eighth anniversary celebration.

The center was officially opened in the University Union Jan. 15, 1982 in commemoration of Martin Luther King Jr. Since then, it has tried to "encourage and facilitate multi-cultural awareness to the entire university community, via increased faculty-staff-student-community interaction," said coordinator Amy Shore.

"Basically, the Multi-Cultural Center has an open house every year to help introduce it to the students who are not familiar with it," Shore said. "There are a lot of students that are new and international as well."

Many faculty members and staff passed by the center as well as a group of Salvadorean students who are spending the school year at Cal Poly. They were able to taste catered oriental dishes and various Native American grains and chips as well as the Greek and South African foods.

"The purpose is to bring everybody together to see the facilities so they know we're here," said Barbara Andre, coordinator of the International Student Program, "and to do some networking so we all know what's going on."

Andre also mentioned that a key reason for the open house was to let other cultural clubs know of the center's existence in order to make use of its facilities.

"Most of the time when it's open, students will come in to study, talk or kick back," said Andre. "Now we're seeing a lot

The center is busiest this month with its celebration of Afro-American history and multi-cultural awareness month, within which the women's week celebration also falls.

Its regular programs this quarter include a speaker's series on Tuesdays, a cultural film series on Wednesdays and an Afro-American study group on Fridays.

The center also offers a selection of publications from various nations, many of which are written in the native tongue.

Andre stressed that since the Cal Poly campus is not notably representative of California's ethnic population, the center's goal is to educate everyone about multi-cultural issues and concerns. It also provides a time for ethnic students to meet ethnic faculty members in the university.

"We were the guinea pigs for the program last quarter, and it turned out great," Lust said.

Orientation meetings for next fall's program will begin this month.

Student competes in modeling contest

By Jena Thompson

Staff Writer

This Saturday, 58 international champions — including a Cal Poly student — will compete at the Stardust Hotel in Las Vegas for an English Leather modeling contract, $12,000 in cash and prizes and a position in the world's best-selling calendar.

Melissa Pascu, a Cal Poly nutritional sciences junior, will compete in world finals this weekend with women from 18 countries.

The contestants were chosen from 1,500 contestants and 400 competitions from around the globe. She arrived last Friday in Las Vegas and rehearsed this week for stage shows.

"She's a beautiful girl, and very sweet," said Bob Perilla, public relations director for English Leather. He said the calendar girl competition, hosted by Dick Van Patten, will be a challenge for the talented women.

Pascu said in a phone interview that she loves the stage and the attention from camera crews and media people. She said she feels nervous about competing with women who take their modeling careers seriously.

Pascu was surprised to make it to the finals after competing for fun in local pageants.

"Anybody can do it," she said. She said her strengths include communicating with people and resisting negative influences.

"I don't let anybody stand in my way."

Missing midterms and not knowing if professors will allow her to make them up did not distract her.

Pascu said she loves rehearsing with women from such countries as Turkey, Greece, Finland, Sweden and the Cal Poly student Melissa Pascu, a nutritional sciences junior, will compete this weekend in the English Leather modeling contest in Las Vegas.

U.S.S.R. She said the Soviet contestant cried during a talk to the other women and said she came here mostly to make friends with everyone.

The women dance, sing and act in stage shows beginning Friday night. In the first dance to Michael Jackson's "Smoothe Criminal," they wear trench coats and hats. They also dance in evening gowns and finish with interviews wearing bathing suits.

Pascu said she enjoys the long days, rehearsing from 8 a.m. to 11 p.m..

The contestants will be narrowed down Saturday to 20, from which 13 receive calendar month positions and cover girl titles. The girls stay in Las Vegas next week to continue performing stage shows.

Pascu said she does not expect to win a calendar title and that just the excitement and experience are rewarding. She can hardly believe she made it this far, she said.

"It's so exciting here walking around and hearing someone say, 'Hey, there's one of the calendar girls,'" said Pascu.

She said her experience this week has nothing to do with her career goals. Pascu graduates next year from Cal Poly and wants to go to UCLA Medical School so she can practice pediatrics.

Bay Area earthquake prompts bill against disaster-area looting

SACRAMENTO (AP) — A bill, prompted by the San Francisco earthquake, to make looting during a disaster a crime, was approved Thursday by the state Assembly.

The bill, AB21x by Assemblyman William Filante, R-San Rafael, was sent to the Senate by a 56-0 vote.

The bill has an "x" designation because it is moving in the special session, which was called last November and continues parallel to the regular session. Bills passed in special session take effect immediately instead of waiting until the next year.

The bill would create the crime of looting, defining it as nonresidential burglary or theft during a natural disaster or state of emergency.

Poly's sailing team in the swim of pre-season regattas

By Natalie Guerrero
Staff Writer

Cal Poly's sailing team is making waves. This year in two pre-season regattas, the team has placed sixth and eighth in national competitions against teams from such schools as the Naval Academy, Princeton, Brown University, University of Hawaii and other California colleges. "Looking at our first practice since fall '89, every regatta we have improved," said Dan Buntz, a skipper of one of the yachts, "and by the end of the season we should be doing really well." The sailing team is an offshoot of Cal Poly's sailing club and, for the past three years, has been competing in regattas up and down the coast. The team's primary goal is to provide students the opportunity to sail competitively on the intercollegiate sailing circuit. As a member of the Pacific Coast Intercollegiate Yacht Racing Association (PCIYRA), the team represents Cal Poly in 15 to 17 regattas throughout California and in at least one out-of-state regatta annually. The team consists of 12 members who compete in an A and B category for the varsity and junior varsity fleets. The team uses two 14-foot two-person yachts called. Each yacht consists of a skipper and one crew member. The team is coed and about half are new members. The next two weekends will be packed with regattas at San Diego and Santa Cruz. Saturday, the team will travel to San Diego for a practice regatta. UCLA, San Diego State, UC Santa Barbara and USC are just a few universities Cal Poly will compete against. "The strategy for this regatta really depends on the winds," Phillips said, "but we looking forward to it." The team is financed mainly by membership fees and fundraisers. Many of the team expenses, including travel and boat maintenance, come from members. The team is scheduled to run a 12-hour "Sail-A-Thon" at Laguna Lake Saturday, Feb. 24. Members invite anyone interested in watching this event to come to Laguna Lake between 6 a.m. and 6 p.m. They will devote most of the time to an intense practice session. The team usually practices every Friday afternoon from noon to 4 p.m. at Morro Bay. More information about the team can be found at Rec Sports in the University Union.
